The three stories in the anthology—The Skeleton, Forsake, and The Solemn Vision—are some of Tagore's less popular works. But together they emerge as quirky and idiosyncratic, not only of the writer but also of the age they are set in. Apparent humour with underlying satire binds the three stories. It is as though the bard is making fun of his characters, and critiquing them and the society at large, all together. Themes of caste oppression; oppression and objectification of women, making them pawns in a bigger, more selfish scheme of things wander in each of the stories. But at the same time each of these stories are subtly subversive. The people who inhabit this universe act according to their age. And yet, very often they mildly disrupt the set ways and patterns and bear the consequences.
